High end Redgate project groundbreaking delayed? A Quincy Quarry News photo

- News about Quincy MA from Quincy Quarry News Quincy next as demand for high end new Boston apartments craters? The Boston broadsheet reports that the demand for the many ne plus ultra apartments built recently in the tonier parts of Boston has softened and apartment leasing agents are having to resort to creative incentives to endeavor to perhaps secure tenants.

Overbuilding is nothing new in real estate, with overbuilding for the high end sometimes resulting in disastrous as well as especially expensive negative outcomes - just ask Donald Trump.

In turn, everyone knows what rolls downhill and it just may have already started rolling down upon Quincy's recent as well as record-setting multi-unit residential housing projects construction frenzy.

Delayed Boardwalk Residences at Marina Bay project A Redgate project rendering

Case in point, Redgate Real Estate Advisers - problematic advisors to both embattled incumbent Quincy Mayor Thomas P. Koch's controversial new Quincy Center redevelopment plans as well as Quincy Mutual Insurance's also controversial plans in addition to its further being an unholy corporate relative of Redgate Capital - is over a year behind on its original July 2014 groundbreaking date for its 352 unit Marina Bay apartment project. In fact, Redgate's Marina Bay project - The Boardwalk Residences at Marina Bay - was fully approved for all intents and purposes in May of 2013.

Further, this still pending groundbreaking development has always been touted as planning to charge the highest rents in Quincy since the project was first floated over three years ago.

Quincy Quarry considered reaching out to Redgate for comment on the apparent delay, but then realized that no one wants to be bothered with any questions in the aftermath of the Labor Day holiday weekend and the start of a new school year.
